INTRODUCTION

Selecting the use of the land has historically been considered as an individual right of property ownership. In the past, land was developed by the owner in a manner to conform with his wishes. In some instances, the desire of the owner was in conflict with the rights of neighboring owners. The concept that a land owner may use his land as he sees fit is valid until the chosen use has an adverse or harmful effect on others. For example, a noisy factory located adjacent to a new residential subdivision could be harmful to homeowners.

Zoning is a locally enacted law that regulates and controls private property. Zoning involves dividing the countryside into districts of zones for agricultural, residential and conditional purposes. The zoning law or resolution then states which specific uses are permitted in each district and under what circumstances. Zoning also regulates the size of lots, distances buildings must be set back from road or property lines, and maximum height of buildings.

Zoning is one response to the complexities of modern day life. Zoning began in cities because, as people started living closer together, a means was required to accommodate the desires of individuals while also considering the common good for all individuals collectively. When cities expanded into rural area, the need for zoning by country and township governments was seen.

A major purpose of zoning is to put land to the use for which it is best suited. Determining the best use for land is a difficult task. Some land is best left to be cultivated because of unique soil characteristics. Other land may be ideally suited for commercial development because it is located near a major highway. Other land, located near a railroad or airport, for example, may be prime land for an industrial park. Another parcel of land, located in a flood plain, should be left for agriculture or other open uses that will not interfere with the natural process of an eventual flood.

The major problem that arises is to determine what is the best use of land in an area. A good future land use plan must consider economic and social factors, as well as physical characteristics of the land. Land in Ohio best suited for farming is often the best land for housing developments. In instances, it is necessary for local residents and decision-makers to determine what they want their area to be in the future and to conduct a program that will achieve this desire. In making decisions about the future of their area, local officials should consider the needs and characteristics of the larger region, as well as their immediate area.

Another important purpose of zoning is to protect or maintain property values. Zoning can protect the value of property by assuring that incompatible uses will be kept apart. Zoning can keep factories out of residential areas (which could lower the value of homes in the immediate vicinity), as well as keep residential uses from locating in industrial areas.

Zoning can also promote the public health and safety by requiring that lots be large enough to allow for the safe disposal of septic tank effluent and by requiring that homes are spaced far enough apart that fires will not spread easily. The promotion of public health and safety are the two basic purposes for which counties and townships are authorized to enact zoning. Both purposes are very broad and may include a wide variety of specific regulations.

Zoning also provides for more orderly development. Regulations pertaining to lot size, set back lines, building height, and population density can make areas more attractive. With zoning, local residents can insure that poor development will not occur.

Finally, zoning can be important in attracting business and industry to an area. Sufficient good land should be zoned for business and industry. The emphasis in zoning land for business and industry should be on a small amount of land that is uniquely suited for business and industry and has adequate access and public facilities.

Legally local governments have three broad types of power: taxation, eminent domain, and police power. Taxation is the legitimate taking of private wealth for public purposes by government. Eminent domain is the taking of land for public purposes. Under the concept of eminent domain, the property owner must be compensated for the market value of the appropriated land. The police power is action by government that protects or promotes the public health, safety, morals or general welfare of its citizens. Police powers for the promotion of the general welfare of its citizens. Police powers for the promotion of the general welfare include both the obvious one - law enforcement - and a wide range of other activities such as health law, pollution control law, building codes, subdivision regulations, and zoning.

For a zoning resolution to be legal, it must be wholly within the concept of the general welfare; that is (1) it must secure a public purpose; (2) it must be reasonable, and (3) it must not be confiscatory.

The public purpose of zoning is to prevent landowners from using their land to the detriment of the general welfare of the community at large. Any action of a landowner which has no bearing on the general welfare of the community such as the color of his house or the arrangement of his furniture is outside the scope of zoning.

Zoning regulations must also be reasonable. There must be a valid reason the furtherance of the general welfare for the regulation to exist, and it must bear at least some relationship to a public purpose. If a zoning resolution sets minimum floor areas for dwellings, the township must be able to show that the requirement bears a reasonable relationship to the general welfare of the area. If certain land uses are to be excluded or severely restricted in the township, the rationality for the general welfare - the health, safety, convenience, comfort, and prosperity - of the citizens.

Zoning must not be confiscatory. The confiscatory element means that the regulation should not prohibit all profitable uses from the land.

Zoning regulations that limit extremely valuable land to low-intensity uses may be confiscatory. A zoning regulation that prohibits golf courses on rolling, wooded land with farmed-out soils might also be confiscatory. If land is being regulated to the extent that the effect is to take the land, courts often rule that the regulation is beyond the scope of the police power and is unconstitutional as applied to the owner's property.

Most rural areas in Ohio, because they are not developed, need some form of zoning to protect their natural resources before they are developed unwisely. Once unplanned development occurs, it is present almost forever, and agricultural land cannot be returned to its former protective use.

The owners of rural land, and in many cases the individual farmer, have the most to gain from rural zoning. A township zoning resolution may not prohibit the use of any land for agricultural purposes.

In addition, a township zoning resolution necessarily excludes structures directly related to agricultural uses. Exempt agricultural structures can be either additions to existing structures or new construction. Examples of these buildings may be storage facilities, barns, feedlots, or equipment buildings.

A 1962 opinion of the Ohio Attorney General addressed the issue of zoning as it relates to agriculture. According to the opinion, a structure used as a dwelling unit by a person engaged in agriculture is not exempt from the provisions of a rural zoning resolution. The main reason for this opinion is that a dwelling is not necessarily directly related to the agricultural use of the land.

Agriculture is only one of several types of land uses which are exempt from county or township zoning resolutions. The Ohio Revised Code also exempts railroads and public utilities from compliance with township or county zoning regulations.

A motor freight carrier is exempt from rural zoning resolutions since it is classified as a public utility. Water and sewer systems are also exempt from zoning. An opinion by the Attorney General stated that a corporation which constructs, maintains, and operates a water system is a public utility, and property used by this corporation is exempt from the provisions of rural zoning resolution.

There are two other important exemptions from rural zoning resolutions. The Ohio revised Code states that "outdoor advertising (billboards) shall be classified as a business use and be permitted in all districts zoned for industry, business or trade, or lands used for agricultural purposes". The distinction between "districts zoned" and "land used" should be carefully noted. Also exempt from regulation is the sale or serving of alcoholic beverages in a zone where retail stores and restaurants are permitted.
